

Author Pens 'The Well Behaved Pet Guardian Book About Dog Training'

Why should we train our dog? There are several answers, and perhaps the most obvious is also the strongest argument: because you will both enjoy it!

January 4, 2010 (FPRC) -- Louisville, CO. Devoted dog owners know the joy and excitement of having a dog as their best friend and family member.

Have you ever tried training your dog and thrown up your hands wondering, 'why won't you listen?' Don't dispare, it happens to all of us. We see it happen when we are walking our dogs around town or when they are running free at the local dog park.

Why should we train our dog? There are several answers, and perhaps the most obvious is also the strongest argument: because you will both enjoy it! But there are a number of others that it's worth knowing about, because training isn't a trivial matter for dogs-it's important for their overall well being.

Why should we train our dog? There are several answers, and perhaps the most obvious is also the strongest argument: because you will both enjoy it!

I wrote this book to be a training aid as seen through the eyes of your best friend. We all love our dogs and we all face the daily task of setting the hierarchy in our home. Your dog is constantly trying to test us and prove they are the top dog. If properly trained, your dog will understand that you are in charge and will always be the top dog.

A lot has been written about the human role as 'pack leader' and the importance of never allowing your dog to dominate you. Don't get so obsessed with being the leader and disciplinarian that you can't allow your dog to play.

Patricia Griecci, founder of Smiling Dog and PlayMore Publishing, knows the problem some pet guardians face. 'A large number of guardians (pet owners) have told me the same thing about asking how to include their best friend in your pack.
