March 31, 2011 (FPRC) -- Beverley Watts, author and expert on long distance relationships, is pleased to announce the launch of her new course Saving a Long Distance Relationship. This new 12 week course will help couples who are struggling with their long distance relationships and teach them how to reignite the spark and keep their love burning.

Many couples are forced to face the prospect of spending long periods of time apart due to economic circumstance or military service, while the increasing popularity of Internet dating also means that some couples are starting their romance at a distance. Beverley's new course is designed to help couples get their long distance relationships back on track and reveal the secrets of success to those struggling to keep love alive.

"My partner and I have been in a long distance relationship since 2006" said Beverley Watts. "This new course is based on real life experience and lessons learnt the hard way."

The course comes in 12 parts and is delivered weekly. The material comes as video (MP4), audio (MP3) and as written material (PDF) making it easily available and accessible for the couple. By following Beverley's advice and putting into practice what she teaches, couples will be able to make the changes necessary for their relationship to survive the transition to a long distance one.

About Beverley Watts

Beverley Watts has been in a long distance relationship since 2006. She and her partner Rob went through a very difficult time trying to make their long distance relationship work but they succeeded and are now happily married. However, they still have to spend a lot of time apart as Rob is in the armed forces. Beverley created 'Saving a Long Distance Relationship' because she wants all couples struggling with their long distance relationships to know that it really can work and to help them avoid the same miseries that she and Rob went through.
