

The Stair Lift Guide Gets Redesign

This week, the Stair Lift Guide, a website that provides information for consumers about stair lifts and other senior health topics, announced a redesign of their website. This update focuses primarily on making information on the website easier to find, as well as ensuring that new visitors to the website are not overwhelmed by the amount of information available on the website.

December 21, 2011 (FPRC) -- This week, the Stair Lift Guide, a website that discusses home lifting aids and fall prevention, got a redesign intended to make it easier to navigate for website visitors. The redesign includes a new front page layout, which provides a quick and easy way to find important articles and topics, as well as a view the most recent articles posted on the website.

In addition to ensuring that information on the Stair Lift Guide is easier to find, the new look also is intended to provide make the website more readable for new users. This is achieved by providing a brief description of the website and well defined sections later in the page to help navigate the online health resources, which help highlight the most pertinent sources of useful information.

Stephen, the head writer and editor, stated "We have a wealth of information available not just on stair lifts, but also other kinds of lifting aids, like wheelchair lifts, as well as tips for preventing senior falls. However, before the redesign, it could be very difficult for new visitors to find the information they need, among our library of health and safety resources. I feel that the new update helps address this issue, by significantly making the website easier to navigate and browse."

The Stair Lift Guide is an established consumer resource for information on many types of home medical devices and lifting aids, providing an unbiased review of these devices. While many of the topics of discussion include information about specific home medical equipment, a number of other topics, including senior health and fall safety is addressed on the website.
