

London is Still One of the Greatest Cities in the World - by Travelrobe

With a population of just under ten million and stretching for more than thirty miles at its broadest point, London is by far one of greatest cities in the world.

London, England, November 29, 2006 (FPRC) -- For any visitor, London is a thrilling place to visit, with its world-class museums, galleries and institutions from the Royal Opera House to the British Museum, Tate Modern and the London Eye, the city can boast to be one of the greatest cities in the world.

Ethnically it's also Europe's most diverse metropolis, around two hundred languages are spoken within its confines, and more than thirty percent of the population is made up of first, second and third generation immigrants. Despite Scottish, Welsh and Northern Irish devolution, London still dominates the national horizon.

London is also where the country's news and money is made, it's where the central government resides and as far as Travelrobe is concerned, it's undeniable that the capital has a unique aura of excitement and success in most walks of British life, if you want to get on you've got to do it in London.

Mark Felix Travelrobe's MD says, anyone planning to visit London should not wait until the 2012 Olympics to visit, you could spend days just shopping in London, with the upper classes in Harrods, or sampling the offbeat weekend markets of Portobello Road and Camden. The music, clubbing, gay, lesbian scenes are second to none.

London is also a great place to eat out, you can sample more or less any kind of cuisine and, wherever you come from, you should find something new and quite possibly unique. Home to some of the best Cantonese restaurants in the whole of Europe, London is also a noted centre for Indian and Bangladeshi food and has numerous French, Greek, Italian, Japanese, Spanish and Thai restaurants; and within all these cuisines, you can choose anything from simple meals to gourmet spreads.
